Singapore to Western Sydney flights begin this Monday, 23 November 2026, when Singapore Airlines (SIA) puts SQ201 in the air from Changi at 11.30am. It is a daily non-stop to Sydneyâ??s newest airport, which opened to passengers on 25 October 2026 and has no night curfew. SIA was the first international airline to commit to the airport.

If you were already eyeing a year-end Sydney trip, this adds a fifth daily SIA flight to the city. It also changes the maths on arrival and departure times.

Singapore to Western Sydney flights: the schedule

Both flights run daily on an Airbus A350-900 medium-haul aircraft. Times are local, and SIAâ??s schedule is subject to regulatory approvals.

- SQ201: leaves Singapore 11.30am, arrives Western Sydney 10.20pm
- SQ202: leaves Western Sydney 11.55pm, arrives Singapore 5.05am the next day
- Valid from 23 November 2026 to 27 March 2027

From 28 March 2027 the timings shift slightly, with SQ201 at 11.35am and SQ202 landing at 5.15am. Daylight saving in Sydney also moves the Sydney-end times an hour earlier from 4 April to 2 October 2027. By my reading of the timetable, that works out to roughly 8 hours in the air each way.

What you fly on

The A350-900 on this route has 303 seats in two cabins: 40 in Business Class and 263 in Economy. There is no First or Premium Economy on this service, so if you want a bigger seat, you need to book Business. SIA says tickets have been on sale since 25 March 2026.

The 11.55pm departure out of Sydney is the clever bit. You can work or sightsee through a full day, board late, sleep on the plane and land in Singapore just after 5am. Connecting passengers get to Changi early enough to catch morning flights onward, since the SIA Group serves more than 130 destinations.

The catch: it is not next to the city

Western Sydney is a long way from the harbour. The Sydney Metro line to the airport is not open yet, with reports pointing to April 2027 at the earliest. Until then, check the airportâ??s official ground transport page for bus links to the nearest train station, and factor in a drive or train transfer after a 10.20pm landing.

- Staying in the CBD: SIA still flies four times daily to Sydney Kingsford Smith, so that remains the easier pick for hotels near Circular Quay
- Visiting family or heading to the Blue Mountains: Western Sydney is likely to be the better fit
- Late arrival: book your first nightâ??s stay or a ride in advance, because you will land after 10pm

For comparison, SIAâ??s Kingsford Smith flights include SQ211 at 10.30am on a Boeing 777-300ER and SQ221 at 8.40pm on an A380, according to the airlineâ??s schedule.

Who this suits

The new route is most useful if your Sydney plans are outside the CBD. Western Sydney is the gateway to the Blue Mountains, according to SIA, and it suits anyone with family in the western suburbs who is tired of a long cross-city drive from Kingsford Smith.

The school holidays run until the end of December, so a new daily flight adds seats at a busy time. Compare both Sydney airports when you search, since prices and availability can differ by date.

Before you book

Check your ticket on SIAâ??s website or app, as schedules are still subject to approvals. Fares move around, and I have not found a published launch fare, so compare dates before you commit.
